

Whaling Commission (IWC) imposed a moratorium on commercial whaling.

The State of Washington and the Makah Whaling Conflict

The state of Washington has the authority to regulate whaling within its borders. In 2002, the state passed a law that allowed the Makah to hunt up to three gray whales per year.

Environmental activists challenged the state law in court. In 2007, a federal judge ruled that the law violated the Marine Mammal Protection Act. The state appealed the ruling, but the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the lower court's decision.

The Ongoing Conflict

The Makah whaling conflict is still ongoing. The Makah have continued to hunt whales despite the legal challenges. Environmental activists have continued to protest the hunts. The state of Washington has been caught in the middle, trying to balance the rights of the Makah with the concerns of environmentalists.

The Makah whaling conflict is a complex and controversial issue. There are no easy answers, and it is likely that the conflict will continue for years to come.
