The Story

The film opens with a young mother, played by Sarah Polley, sitting in her living room, staring at a photograph of her son. She is clearly grieving, and her eyes are filled with tears. As she sits there, she begins to hear her son's voice calling her name. She looks around, but she can't see him anywhere. She starts to get scared, and she calls out to him, but he doesn't answer.

The mother starts to see visions of her son everywhere she goes. She sees him in the park, playing with his friends. She sees him in the kitchen, eating his favorite cereal. She even sees him in her bed, sleeping next to her.

At first, the mother is comforted by these visions. They make her feel like her son is still with her. But as time goes on, the visions start to become more and more disturbing. She starts to see her son as a ghost, and she starts to hear him crying and begging her to play with him.

The mother is terrified by these visions, and she doesn't know what to do. She tries to ignore them, but they just keep getting worse. She starts to lose sleep, and she starts to withdraw from her friends and family. She feels like she's going crazy.

One day, the mother can't take it anymore. She goes to see a therapist, who tells her that she is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The therapist tells her that she needs to grieve her son's death in order to move on with her life.

The mother starts to go to therapy, and she slowly starts to heal. She starts to accept the fact that her son is gone, and she starts to let go of the guilt and shame that she has been carrying around.

The film ends with the mother sitting in her living room, looking at the photograph of her son. She is still grieving, but she is no longer consumed by her grief. She has found a way to live with her loss, and she has found a way to honor her son's memory.
